KENTUCKY – CLIMATE

<https://www.britannica.com/place/Kentucky>

Kentucky enjoys a temperate climate and generally plentiful rainfall. The state's mean annual temperature is between 55 and 60 °F (13 and 16 °C). However, extremes of temperature exceeding 110 °F (43 °C) and dropping below -30 °F (-34 °C) have been recorded occasionally. In the capital city, average high temperatures in January and February are in the low 40s F (about 6 °C), and average low temperatures are in the low 20s F (about -5 °C); in July and August temperatures usually rise from the low 60s F (about 17 °C) into the mid-80s F (about 30 °C) daily. The yearly growing season lasts about 170 to 210 days, depending on location.

Mean annual precipitation is about 45 inches (1,140 mm). Although the fall months (September through November) are often somewhat drier, precipitation is generally well distributed throughout the year. The greatest differences occur between the southern areas, which receive nearly 50 inches (1,300 mm) annually, and the northeast, which may receive only 40 inches (1,000 mm). Thunderstorms are frequent and often cause flooding in eastern Kentucky. Prevailing winds are from the south and southwest, although north and northwest winds often bring the chill of winter.
