NEVADA – CLIMATE

<https://www.britannica.com/place/Nevada-state>

Nevada's climate is sunny and dry, with wide variation in daily temperatures. The normal daily temperature at Reno is 49°F (9°C), ranging from 32°F (0°C) in January to 69°F (21°C) in July. The all-time high, 125°F (52°C), was set at Laughlin on 29 June 1994; the record low, -50°F (-46°C), at San Jacinto on 8 January 1937.

Nevada is the driest state in the US, with overall average annual precipitation (1971–2000) of 7.5 in (19 cm) at Reno. Snowfall is abundant in the mountains, however, reaching 60 in (152 cm) a year on the highest peaks.

The mountains of the Sierra Nevada along the state's western boundary often cause clouds of Pacific origin to drop their moisture before reaching Nevada, thus producing a semiarid climate. The driest regions are in the southeast and near Carson Sink (a now-dry basin that was the center of a lake system during the last major ice age, some 11,500 years ago), where annual precipitation seldom exceeds 4 inches (100 mm). The northeast has as little as 8 inches (200 mm) of precipitation annually, whereas annual precipitation in the northwestern mountains often reaches 24 inches (600 mm). Temperatures vary as widely. July temperatures average about 70 °F (21° C) in the north and in the mid-80s F (about 30 °C) in the south. In January the averages range from the low 20s F (about -4 °C) in the north to about 40 °F (4 °C) in the south. The northern and eastern areas have long, cold winters and short, relatively hot summers, whereas in southern Nevada the summers are long and hot and the winters brief and mild.
